

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Anthropological research is a meeting point of many paths and always requires the solidarity of many. During its course distances are surpassed, new places are known and one becomes familiar with new forms of thought and establishes new relationships.

With some people, scattered in the furthest corners of the earth and engaged in different activities, subtle but firm streams of sympathy are created, which allow one to think with confidence and trust of the grand world.

To all those we wish to express our recognition and, while apologizing to those whom we have surely forgotten, we thank the following for having collaborated with us and having made this research possible:
